THURSDAY EVENING, APRIL 21.

A TERRIBLE ENCOUNTER.—Monday forenoon F. W. Flowerdew, a farmer, living alone many miles west of Lincoln, Neb., was out in the field stepping off a portion to plough, when he noticed a range steer about half a mile distant. He went on with the measurement, but presently, hearing something approach, he turned and saw the steer coming at him full speed, head down, and about 20 yards away. Mr. Flowerdew was not armed, and his only way to avoid being struck by the first charge was to dodge it which he did. The steer turned and came again, but with not so much force, and Mr. Flowerdew succeeded in getting his right hand into its nostril. Here the battle began between man and beast. The steer was three years old, and as Flowerdew is a tall and powerful man it made a nearly equal fight. For over half an hour they struggled. All the while Flowerdew was working his way to the house, in front of which he secured a heavy curb. When he got hold of this he had a little better show, and commenced to pound the steer over the head and nose. This the steer stood and suffered, but the minute the pounding stopped the brute charged and had to be beaten off. The last desperate effort made by the steer knocked Flowerdew to the ground. Although the animal was fast falling from loss of blood it gored its victim horribly. Flowerdew's injuries are fatal. The steer, from the loss of blood and exhaustion fell dead at his side.
